

Peacebuilding efforts in Sierra Leone must address natural resource governance

Press release 10 October 07. For immediate release.

Global Witness urged today both the newly-elected government of Sierra Leone and the UN Peacebuilding Commission (PBC) to include natural resource management in the peacebuilding strategy for the country.<sup>[i]</sup>

“Where natural resources have played a role in conflict, they must be considered by the Peacebuilding Commission as a crucial step in ensuring an effective approach to peacebuilding and to help countries avoid relapsing into conflict” says Patrick Alley, Director of Global Witness.

Natural resources were identified in earlier drafts as part of the four key peacebuilding needs prioritised by the government of Sierra Leone. They have since been dropped from the draft of the integrated peacebuilding strategy. This is a worrying omission.

Youth marginalisation, endemic corruption and bad governance were identified as the root causes of Sierra Leone’s civil war. Natural resource exploitation became an economic driver, perpetuating the conflict.

In 2007, Global Witness visited parts of the country historically linked to the conflict and found evidence of a persisting pattern of youth marginalisation and tension linked to enduring corruption and mismanagement of the mineral sector.

In the war-battered diamond district of Kono, communities told Global Witness that they felt marginalised and that their land was being taken away. Despite being a Kimberley Process<sup>[ii]</sup> participant since 2003, government controls over diamond areas are weak and poorly enforced and the industry is still characterised by exploitation, poverty and poor working conditions.

The problems identified in Kono are not unique to diamond mining operations; during investigations Global Witness visited other mining areas and found a similar pattern of tension and growing frustration among the communities affected by mining.

“Failure to address these issues could, in the context of the enduring endemic corruption and lack of economic and social development, contribute to undermining the peacebuilding efforts of the government of Sierra Leone, international donors and other stakeholders” added Patrick Alley.
